The benefits for me of being able to work online is that I'm able to fit my working hours around my personal commitments and my family commitments as well.

Tutoring online gives me the flexibility I can tutor from anywhere in the world via Skype or via email, news blackboard, whatever and so we both get the benefits of very considerable flexibility.

I can be doing my work at any time of day, I can also Skype anywhere in the world as we know so long as I've got a good dial-up and I can be sitting on the beach with my iPad writing my programmes, so it is very, very good.

I very much enjoy teaching online, it helps my lifestyle; I turned sixty the other week. We are keen carvanners, my wife and I we have grandchildren now so we have other things in our life as well and it means that we can be very flexible.

The senior online tutor team at the University of Derby have been there for me every time I've needed them and I've been with the university since its launch, so I needed them a great deal at the beginning, they were patient, we learnt together. My main enjoyment in many ways as an online tutor for Derby is the students that I meet throughout the course of a module. I've met a range of students from a range of nations and with a range of industrial backgrounds, so I feel as though I come away from a module having learnt things as well.
